Bart's Thoughts

Keep to the left I told myself as I attempted to avoid the dead animal in the road. I suppose you have heard it said that the best way to avoid a hazard in the road is to look at a place to the side of the hazard. Then you will go where you are looking and miss the hole, a dead animal or whatever it is. In other areas of life it isn't always so easy. When we look away from it that confronts us we can sometimes avoid pain. But more often we must deal with it to minimize the discomfort even if dealing with it is uncomfortable. It is a "Dealing with your problem like a man" kinda thing. Face the situation and deal with it honestly and it as best you can, like a thinking human being. Have you ever held something in, Carried it with you not knowing how to or wanting to deal with it? This is something if disturbing to you, will be detrimental to your health after much time has passed. Mental anguish produces physical symptoms eventually. A problem properly dealt with is a problem no more. The secret of misdeed is not a good secret to hold. Keeping to the left I told myself, helped me to avoid a possible slide-out on that turn with the animal carcass. I was now happy that I dealt with the situation so well and avoided consequences that would surely have come otherwise.

Happy I am riding my motorcycle. Happy I am when camping. Happy I am when with friends. I am happiest when motorcycle camping with friends. What a Camp-out that was at Maumee Bay this year! It was made even better by the good weather we enjoyed. Less than ten miles from my home but by riding four or five short runs with my friends I managed to put on well over 200 miles before arriving home.

I am looking at a cat in the window of the house next door. This cat on the second floor is owned by one of two sons who have their bedroom upstairs. Their mother doesn't like cats so the cat always stays upstairs, always. It was a kitten when the eighteen-year-old son brought it home, unannounced to the mother. After about six months she saw the cat. When she went upstairs, which was a rare occasion, to investigate a scratching sound. After much talk at the dinner table a deal was cemented with the son. The cat stays but never strays from bedroom above. So there the cat sits looking back at me as I sit here tapping the keys for this newsletter article. It can see from only one window I am told. Down is the drive where cars are parked. To the left it sees two garages To the right it can take in the street and many trees and plants across the street. But most enticing and most intently observed is the annual nest of young so precariously placed in the eaves of my home directly across the driveway. Precarious, because there is but four inches of space on which the wedge of twigs and dried grass must rest. Each year the same pair builds and rebuilds their nest. The winds and rain do destroy it so easily. Each year there is a loss from the nest as small unfeathered wings provide no lift. The cat watches. The cat waits, the cat desires. I also can see down to the driveway, etc., etc. My gaze, when not upon the keys is to the street whenever a whirl or rumble bounces off the houses up the drive and through my open window. Ah, it is to me as the chirping fledglings are to the feline, music of my desires. That mechanical symphony of tones enters me, as it enters the window. What am I to do but satisfy these desires of passion that has stayed with me from youth, young adulthood and now the middle age of my life? Get down to the garage! Start the machine! Get those two wheels rolling, go, go, go!
